EAST LYNNE-MISS ADA GRAY. Tuesday night we will have a new version of East Lynne by Miss Ada Gray. The Augusta, Ga., Chronicle and Constitutionalist of Oct. 21st, 1882, says:

in Augusta is almost as pathetic as the character she so faithfully represents. It has been her misfortune to encounter in-clement weather during every visit to this city, so that her acting here has not been fully appreciated. The audience at the opera-house last night might be called a fair one, considering the weather. Certainly we are led to believe that under differ-ent circumstances a fine house would have greeted a troupe which gives the play in a style at once so elegant and complete. Miss Ada Gray is pherhaps the finest Lady Isabel now on the stage. She has grown into the character into which she has placed her whole soul, and has almost etched into her life the woe and the weariness of the hand of genius is more subtle in the weav-ing of the frost work than in the raging of the storm. Still, the more exalted and absorbing passages of the play are met with a full womanly spirit and strength, which call up before them the enthusiasm of her hearers. She is a perfect mistress of every conception of the piece, from gay to grave, from mirth to melancholy. Actually, last
